This view of Lodi High's campus shows the southwest corner of the Main Building and the archway joining the Science Building. During school time, students may be seen rapidly walking or gaily sauntering along these familiar sidewalks going to or coming from classes.

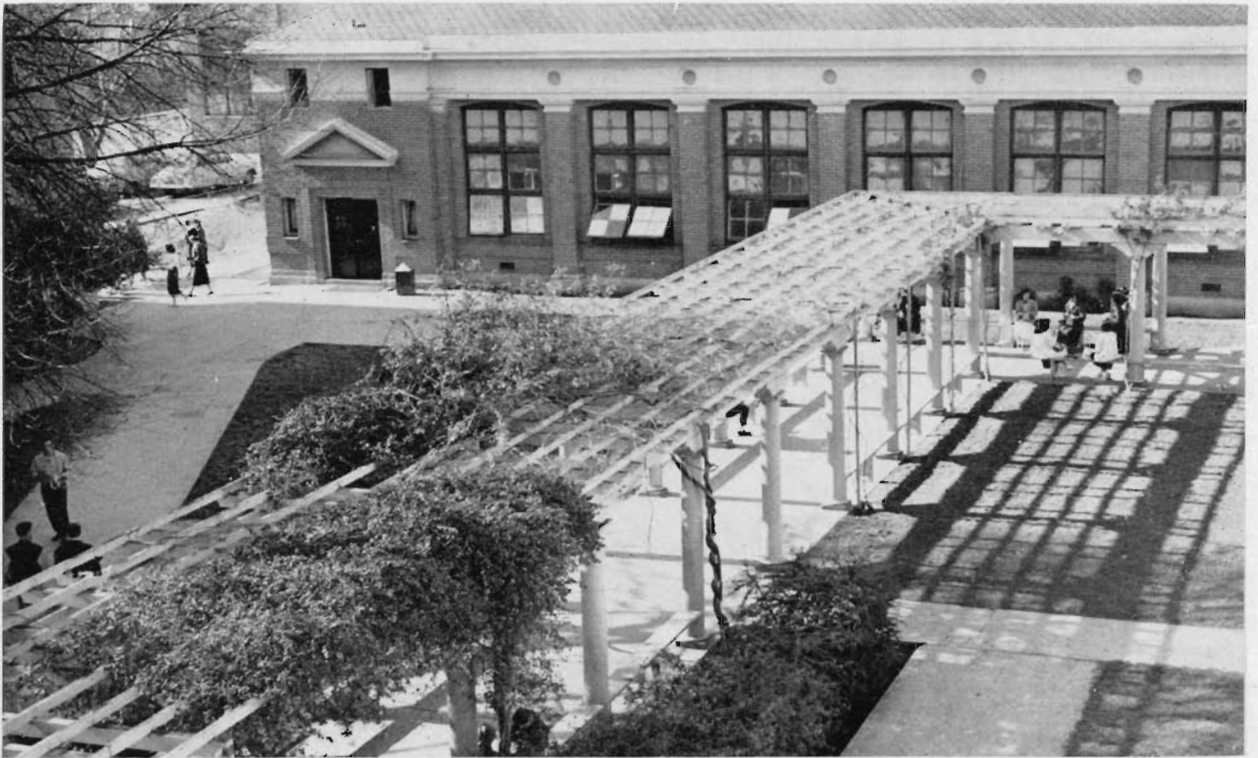

In the Science Building of Lodi High, facilities are provided for the teaching of general science, biology, photography, physiology, chemistry, home economics, and physics, besides such miscellaneous subjects as algebra and speech.

This is, perhaps, one of the most familiar of our campus scenes. Students walk hurriedly along the sidewalks in the foreground toward the grandstand in order to secure "ring-side" seats for rallies or award assemblies.

In the Ag Building are situated not only several classrooms used by promising young Future Farmers but also the Rumpus Room, the well-known location for many business meetings, film showings, and club activities.

Although this very attractive view of the Girls' Gym has been seldom noticed by most students, a few observant young people may have glimpsed its beauties from the third-floor windows of the Main Building.

On Friday afternoon teen-agers eagerly read the week's edition of our school newspaper, the "Flame," as they sit under the shade of one of the arbors, familiar "landmarks" of the campus.
