Second-class seamen! Such are the juniors on the ship. Their four-year journey three-fourths over, they feel confident of sailing home with flying colors—naturally. Many of them echo the sentiments expressed by John Masefield in "Sea-Fever"—

I must down to the seas again, to the lonely sea and the sky,
 And all I ask is a tall ship and a star to steer her by,
 And the wheel's kick and the wind's song and the white sail's shaking,
 And a grey mist on the sea's face and a grey dawn breaking.
 I must down to the seas again, for the call of the running tide
 Is a wild call and a clear call that may not be denied;
 And all I ask is a windy day with the white clouds flying,
 And the flung spray and the blown spume, and the sea-gulls crying,
 I must down to the seas again to the vagrant gypsy life,
 To the gull's way and the whale's way where the wind's like a whetted knife;
 And all I ask is a merry yarn from a laughing fellow-rover,
 And quiet sleep and a sweat dream when the long trick's over.

Of course, a modern freighter is somewhat different from the romantic sailing vessel that so enchanted Masefield, just as the modern school differs from the "little red schoolhouse." But the second-class man feels the call "down to the seas again" when the summer vacation is over; he may grumble a little about going back to work again, but he really is pleased to again hear "a wild call and a clear call" in September. In every activity of the ship he knows he is needed and important. He knows that next year he will be a first-class seaman; so he must make the most of this year. Perhaps he's not quite as prominent as the fourth-year sailors, but he's almost.

The second-class seaman has considerable hair on his chest, probably a tattoo or two, and an extensive vocabulary of the stronger words in the English language. He can fight his own battles and knows his way around the world. Of more importance, he has acquired a good many skills and a great deal of practical knowledge during his first two years at sea—one as an apprentice and one as a third-class seaman. The older sailors and the officers know that they can trust him and delegate to him considerable responsibility; after all, it won't be long until he's that most glorious creature of all, a first-class sailor. So he does his work conscientiously and willingly, realizing his important position on the ship.

All aboard for the second trip! The sailors who were mere apprentices last year have had a few months leave and are now returning to the ship as third-class seamen. How much larger and more mature they are! With how much confidence do they swing aboard and start their work on the good old tub!

During the first few weeks much of their leisure time is spent in feeling and acting superior to the green apprentices, and perhaps they give a few moments to speculation on the fact that they were just as inexperienced and awkward a year ago. How the time flies along when aboard the boat! And how much one learns in a year!

The third-class seamen are beginning to enter into all the ship's activities, and gone are the days of feeling small and insignificant. Now they will have a chance to show that they can contribute their share to the life of the ship. Sports, dramatics, organizations—all of these activities are entered by the sailors. After all it won't be so very long before they'll be the largest and oldest members of the crew, second-class sailors, and the following year, first-class sailors!

Of course the captain and the officers feel that they should give these seasoned "salts" considerably more work than is doled out to the apprentices. What a lot of polishing of brass, scrubbing of decks, attending to the engine rooms—and so on—and on! The third-class seamen may complain now and then (as the night work gets heavier), but they are really pleased with the extra work, for it proves that they are growing mature and reaching positions of responsibility. The officers no longer have to give detailed and elaborate instructions when the orders for work are given out to the sailors who have already had a year on the ship.

There is a great thrill in feeling accustomed to the ship, the officers, and the work, but it takes about a year to "get into the stride." During the second year the sailors are feeling their own strength and glorying in it. Some of them are a bit cocky, but that's to be expected—everyone goes through the experience of feeling assured and confident where once he felt ignorant and awkward. No longer are they green around the gills when a storm comes up; no longer do they feel blue and homesick. The ship is really their second home; they feel as natural and happy there as when under their parents' snug roofs on the shore. A kind word from Captain Ellis now and then, friendly hours with the officers (stern but just), good-natured fun with their fellow sailors, and a great deal of good hard work—what could be better? Of course, it's rather hard to give up some of the evenings to so much work, but after all, the third-class seamen have proved that they can "take-it."

SOPHOMORES

Freshmen are the young apprentices on our ship, and they have signed up for a four-year journey. As they are green and inexperienced, they have a rather hard time becoming accustomed to the new life and finding their "sea legs." At the beginning come those terrible few days of the first year's trip, and some of the apprentices become desperately seasick, and homesick (how much simpler and less confusing was life before this trip).

But with a little instruction these newcomers rapidly adjust themselves to the new life. They realize that the captain is a friendly soul and that he has had many years of experience in guiding his ship through the whirlpools and storms that every seaman must accept. They learn to revere and respect their captain, and they gradually realize that the officers are decent and kindly. And—most important of all—they learn to cooperate with the third-class, second-class, and first-class seamen. Naturally they take some kidding at first, for such is the way of life—on land or sea. But after a few weeks the joking is over, and the apprentices realize that the older sailors are really very helpful and kind.

During February of the first year's trip the boat comes into port, and a new group of apprentices is taken aboard the vessel. And now those greenhorns of the fall can look down on someone a little humbler and more inexperienced than themselves. How awkward the new apprentices seem—and how scared! Naturally, the September group enjoys seeing the "boners" and assorted mistakes that are made by the February entrants.

By the end of the first year's trip, however, both groups are working together harmoniously and feel definitely a part of the ship's activity. They can look back to their first few days at sea and smile at their own mistakes.

Of course, many apprentices are not very active in the many activities enjoyed by the crew, but some of them "make their mark" during the first year. They realize that when they are older and larger there will be a more important place for them in the calendar of events on the good ship; but everyone has to start at the beginning, and every important first-class seaman was once a mere apprentice.

Of primary importance is the spirit that is developed among the apprentices during the first year. Every ship must have a certain morale that is essential for its very existence. Loyalty, patience, cooperation, enthusiasm—these are qualities that good seamen must learn, and the first year is of vital importance. On our ship the apprentices have developed these qualities, and they have demonstrated them throughout the year's trip.

As the first year's voyage draws to a close, the "gobs" take stock of themselves and look forward to three more long trips—we are sure they will be happy and successful ones. And they naturally look back on a crowded and eventful year, full of some hard knocks but a great many hours of fun and happiness. They can say farewell to the ship during the summer time, but next fall they'll be back as third-class seamen!
